2. Citations and explanations (Rule 70.7)

The invention concerns a mobile device and a method for perceptively accentuating in the form of e.g. vibration, message elements like smilies of an SMS message (haptic messaging) and deals with current standardisation issues that so far blocks the introduction of haptic messaging in mobile phones from different manufacturers.

The object of the invention is to provide a device and a method for perceptively accentuating message elements of a message without requiring any standardisation of perceptively accentuated messaging.

Cited Document:

D1: US 20020191757A1

D2: WO 0057617A

Document D1 describes a method and related mobile device for perceptively accentuating message elements of an SMS message (see abstract). According to D1 a set of selected messages (message tags) is defined, wherein these message tags are assigned perceptible accentuating signals (sound effects/graphic effects). These tags assigned with perceptible accentuating signals are included in SMS text messages and are searched in the messages and a corresponding sound or graphical effect is generated or produced. In D1 it is also discussed different alternatives on when to produce the different signals assigned to the tags, i.e. at which velocity, such as dependent on the users ability to scroll the message received, and that the messaging used is not restricted to SMS messages and could be an e-mail (see paragraphs [0057]-[0058], and paragraphs [0074]-[0094], and figures 3-5, 7, 8).
